Dear Department of Justice,

I am concerned that the Microsoft's proposed punishment does not adequately (nothing?) to address correcting is predatory antitrust behavior that stifles others innovation and rewards them for being big and continuing to control the desktop AND the applications that run on the operating system and desktop. My personal opinion is that short of splitting the company, the only thing that might help is forcing them to sell a completely stripped version of their operating system at a correspondingly low price.

They have destroyed all competition not only for the operating system, one operating system probably enough just like one gauge of railroad track, but also destroyed all competition for applications on the operating system (read trains, shipping companies, etc.) I suggest you revisit separating the operating system division of the company from the applications division.

Thank you for considering my comments,
